I. COURSE DESCRIPTION

This is an interdisciplinary review and analysis of the social, political and development issues in contemporary China. The unique characteristics of these issues are born out of the particular mode of production and developmental policies China adopted. Over more than half of a century of development, China has experimented with various strategies with differing results. To provide a historical background, this course reviews the major development periods in recent history.

In order to understand the current developmental issues, this course reviews the specific conditions of the China's transformation. First, contemporary China is a Third World nation, progressing through industrialization, dualism, urbanization and resource constraint. Second, contemporary Chinese development either reflects or rebels against its historical heritage and cultural context. Third, China is undergoing a fundamental political economic transition - Economic Reform, which addresses to the structural deficiencies of socialism and adapts into market economy. Fourth, China's 'Open-Door' policy directs its production into the global network. Globalization, while fueling economic growth, has major impacts to domestic affairs. This course identifies and discusses key transformation developmental issues under these three transitional conditions.

The most striking event in contemporary Chinese development is the radical change from a centralized socialist economy to a global market economy. Necessarily, much of the economic power is transferred from the state to the society, The expansion of the domain of the society extends beyond the economic to the social and political spheres. The institutional adjustments and the state devolution give rise to complex political and social adjustments. This course examines the most prominent areas of interaction between state and society.

Students will form groups (3 students per group) to do oral and power-point presentations. The Reading Review develops technique for summarizing and synthesizing diverse reading material, and ability to analyze, evaluate and explore new idea. Each student will do a 15-minute presentation for the assigned reading. The Essay and oral Examinations direct students to compose intellectual dialogues and critical comments.

1. VIDEO REVIEW

1. The course makes use of the visual images to demonstrate the reality of Chinese development and politics. They also provide subjects for discussion. After the selected videos are shown, there will be a 45 min. class discussion. The written video review is a summary and analysis of the visual experience summarizing the visual narrative, and analyzing its relevance and relations to lectures and readings. The review should include:

A. General Review

- a. describe the overall objectives and theme of the video,
- b. how well the video achieves its objectives,
- c. how visually effective is the video.

B. Specific Discussion

- a. identify the most striking and the most pointless scenes,
- b. explain how these scenes contribute to or distract from the overall objectives.

C. Conclusion

- b. evaluate the educational value of the video.

The video review (1,500 words, 6 pages) must be submitted one week after the presentation. Each student must sign up for oral presentation the second week of the class. Late submission incurs a grade deduction.

2. READING REVIEW PAPER

The reading review paper is based on all required readings within one of the course topics (in IV. Reading List). These readings present different views and often draw different conclusions. Students can assess the required readings in the Laulima files (see the Reading List instruction). Based on the readings, the paper includes a summary report, and an exposition of the topic. There are three working stages:

A. Sign up for selected topic by Week 3.

Select a topic from the Course Topics List #3-14. Topics are assigned on a 'first come, first serve' basis.

No more than four students can sign up for the same topic.

Students are urged to discuss this assignment individually with one of the instructors, when preparing for the review. Arrange individual discussion sessions with an instructor. For the oral presentation, each student presents one paper. The first three signers will decide on the individual required reading between themselves. The last signer will be assigned one of the optional readings by the instructor.

The paper should include:

- a. a summary and synthesis of the required readings,
- b. the theme and focus of the discussion'
- c. a comparative analysis: explain the differences between readings, and assess their comparative merits/shortcomings and usefulness,
- d. a conclusion: explain how well the readings help you in understanding the topic, and suggest questions for further exploration.

The paper should be typed, and double spaced (2,500 words, 10 pages). Students present orally and submit Reading Review Papers in the respective sessions and lead discussion. Late submission incurs a grade deduction.

If a student wishes to revise the Reading Review Paper, the paper must be submitted one week after lecture of that week, allowing sufficient time for comments and revision. Papers submitted after that week cannot be revised and will receive comments and final grade only.

3. FINAL ESSAY AND ORAL EXAMINATION

This assignment is a take-home exam. The Essay Examination requires analytic discussions on two essay questions. The two essay questions are related to the selected course topics. There will be a week oral examination based on the students' written exams. The professor will give the exam questions back to students while doing the oral exams.

The two essays allow students to further develop the debates and deepen their perception and understanding.

The essay exam questions are given at the 14th week of the semester (2 pages for each question; 1,000 words, 4 pages for the entire Essay Exam).

A. Distribute Essay Exam Questions in Week 15.

B. Submit Essay Exam Paper before the Examination Week.

4. Feed Back Interaction

The class will encourage interact between the instructor and students at everal different stages of writing assignments.

1. The beginning/idea stage for Video presentation and essay review: Outline/thesis: students are required to send the instructor one page outline for the assignment. This stage makes sure that students understand the theme of the video for oral presentation and key concepts for the readings. This will help students to organize ideas.

2. Rough Draft: Students will be encouraged to send a rough draft one month before the due date for writing assignments: The instructor will make comments in terms of the effectiveness. Students will know if readers will be given enough information.3. Students will be encouraged to use the writing
